Paul Fleischman's novel was about a teenager named Brent who goes to a party with his friend, gets drunk, drives, and kills a girl. I'm writing about his actions.

Brent drives to the party with a so-called friend. At the party, he gets drunk under age, and then he tries to hit the host (I mean, come on, Brent, use that noggin). After drinking plenty of alcohol, he gets behind the wheel (WHAT ARE YOU THINKING!!!). One of his huge mistakes was not really thinking of consequences.

Now let's think about the positives. Number One: Brent gets to travel the world and try new things. Number Two: Brent gets to meet new people and have more interactions, like the man at the campground or the band. Number Three: Brent gets to do something for the girl's family that makes the mother feel good and the girl's joy be spread.

I think in the end he had such a good time around the country, so why not use what's left on the pass and continue around the nation. I don't really think there were any consequences from this. His parents might worry though.

After reading this great book, I now know, DON'T DRINK UNDER AGE. If there's beer at a party, it might not be bad to leave.
